she thought she could just slip in and out of his bed without him knowing she was there. so what if he caught her? she had to be here. what were the chances it would even matter to him if she was there? the thought triggered a roar, but it quickly faded as she realised this was a step too far. she'd crossed the line. he might be her dad, but he was also her boss. she would make a fool of herself. what would her mother think? her father? when would she learn to keep her nose out of his business? she could smell his cigarette breath, see the stubble on his chin. george pulled her mouth closed before he had a chance to speak. his eyes burned with furious rage, and she knew he was going to ask her what she had been doing. she would never get away with it. she would never in a million years be able to explain it to him. the room felt like it had gone cold, and george sat on the edge of the bed for a moment. how did she get here? he rubbed his face trying to push back the anger. he didn't want to feel this way. she was his daughter. her mother's daughter. she should have been here. he stood up, his body jerking in reaction to the anger. as he reached for his jacket to grab his car keys he realised something was wrong. where the hell was his jacket? it had gone when they had walked in. all his clothes were in a mess. what was going on? he was going to go crazy. the only thing he could think of was to throw a chair at the window. the thought of it made him laugh out loud. he opened it a crack. there was something stuck to the bottom of it. his headache would have been better, but it was too late for that. he stumbled out into the waiting arms of his assistant.
